Take a look at my new home. I moved here shortly after being diagnosed with a digestive condition called diverticulitis. Now I don't want to go into all the ins and outs of the ailment. If you're interested, Google it. But suffice to say, I won't be taking any long journeys without mapping out a bathroom every thirty minutes. At least on a good day. Now, I could get all down in the dumps about all this (pun intended). But the diagnoses could have been so much worse. I can live with this condition, although not as comfortably as I would like.

It all started a while back when I felt a rumbling in my stomach, and my appetite ceased to exist. Foods I loved ended up being tossed from my plate to become treats for my hound dog. Crispy fried chicken, big juicy burgers, and even pizza with all the toppings and extra cheese no longer appealed to me. I realized I needed to seek out a member of the medical profession because when I can't eat pizza, something is defiantly amiss.

My primary care doctor referred me to a gastroenterologist, and after a three-minute interrogation, he decided I needed to have a tube with a camera shoved down my throat and a garden hose inserted into a place I've tried not to think much about until now. To make matters worse, the day before the colonoscopy, I had to drink half a gallon of what tasted like Kool-Aid flavored bug spray. All I wanted him to do was give me a pill to make my stomach demons retract their claws, lay down their laces and stop stomping around my intestines in cleats.

I don't usually do a great deal of bellyaching (another pun intended). And I have always tried to keep a positive attitude. But these earthly bodies do wear out as they age. We start out in this world bald and helpless, wearing a diaper, and those of us who are blessed enough to live a long life end up in pretty much the same condition. I do genuinely appreciate every moment of life God has seen fit to give me. And that's true, whether I'm under the weather or on top of the world.

So, if anyone needs me, I'll be sitting on the throne, in my new castle. It's not the most spacious place, and it could use a coat of paint. It is, however, a nice spot to read, and I have a good stash of corn cobs. Until next time ... just think about it.

Growing your own transplants expands your choices

Garden centers are beginning to fill their shelves with pots of vegetables and flowers. The lush green, the vivid yellows, oranges and blues you find at this time of year can entice you to stuff your cart with plants for your garden. Certainly, it's an easy way to start your garden in the spring, but there is another way: starting your own plants from seeds.

The big advantage in growing your own transplants is the wider choice of varieties available in seed form. Commercial growers tend to concentrate on a few popular varieties. Anyone walking into a garden center and being faced with row after row of begonias, impatiens and Better Boy tomatoes can understand that. Seed catalogs and even the seed displays in home centers offer a much wider variety.

You can begin vegetable transplants outdoors at this time of year, usually starting late March to early April, but protection from colder weather is a must. While a greenhouse is not essential, being able to control temperature, light, moisture and ventilation is crucial. Simple cold frames and hot beds can easily be made from scrap lumber and old window frames you may have lying around in your garage or shed. Kits also are available from many sources. Row covers made of a variety of materials can help maintain humidity and prevent die-off when temperatures drop at night. Be sure to provide ventilation on sunny days, otherwise your transplants will overheat and die.

You can buy all the materials you need for starting transplants at local garden supply centers or through seed and garden supply catalogs. Starter kits containing all the necessary equipment also are available. Some have the seed already planted; you only need to add water and put them in a suitable growing area.

To start seeds indoors, you must provide plenty of bright light and the proper humidity. Sow seeds in a plant tray containing an artificial growing medium of peat moss and perlite, which you can find at garden centers. Mixing in about 25% compost can reduce the need for fertilizers later and encourage seed germination. Enclose the seeded trays in a plastic bag and keep them at room temperature until seedlings emerge. Then, remove the plastic and transfer the trays to suitable growing areas. The average windowsill usually does not get enough light. Use artificial light such as a mixture of cool white and warm white fluorescent lamps, plant-growth fluorescent lamps or LED grow lights to supplement. Locate the lamps five to 10 inches from the foliage and operate those 12 to 18 hours/day. Be sure to keep seedlings cool enough at night (60° to 65°F) for strong, sturdy growth after they germinate.

About two weeks before transplanting them to the garden, plants should be hardened off (toughened) so they can withstand the outside environment. To do so, begin reducing water and fertilizer (though don't let them dry out), gradually expose them to higher sunlight conditions and expose them to lower outside temperatures but take them inside when temperatures drop below the mid-40s to prevent cold damage. Next time we will talk about how to properly transplant to the garden.
