CAROLYN HAX

Boyfriend is in a big rush to move in together

BY CAROLYN HAX
tellme@washpost.com

Dear Carolyn: I've been dating "Kevin" for a while (about seven months) and am really enjoying it, except that he has been pushing a conversation about moving in together since approximately Month 4. He lived with roommates until last year and I think he is feeling the pinch of living alone, which I don't think is a good enough reason to combine households. We are both in our thirties and I also feel weirded out by the idea that maybe he doesn't know how to live alone. On the other hand, if this is headed toward marriage, then it might make all the sense in the world to test out our compatibility now? With the pressure I feel from him, I have started to get confused about what I actually want. How do I figure that out?

— Confused

Confused: There is nothing confusing about your confusion. Pressure famously, obviously disrupts our ability to sort through our own priorities in a dispassionate way. Nuggets of self-knowledge like, "Do I love Kevin, do I even like Kevin, do I know Kevin well enough at 4-7 months to trust my opinion of him and our compatibility, and what's with all this freaking pressure, Kevin?"

As the pressure mounts, it tends to displace those other priorities, until it's all about the pressure itself — how to make it stop. The whole point is to weaken our resistance to giving someone what they want. But you're just busy thinking, "I might regret not buying the car at this price" ... uh, wrong index card ... "It might make sense to test our compatibility now!" Anxious thoughts of a deal you wouldn't be thinking about in Month 7 if he'd simply let you be. That's why it's so important to understand and be unafraid to use other ways of making pressure stop — like walking away. That's the simplest and surest method. It also isn't just for showrooms, because pressure can happen in any context and it's disrespectful of your autonomy anywhere. More so when it's about what you do with your life. Since you think highly of Kevin, you can give him a good faith chance to show you he respects you and your needs by backing off: "Kevin. You've been asking since Month 4, and if I were comfortable then I would have said yes." Say you expect time and space to be yourself — not time in which you are relentlessly lobbied to give him what he wants. After drawing your line: "Please respect that. Pushing the conversation says you see my 'no' as negotiable. Not OK." Take his response seriously, both in the moment and over time. Can he accept this without getting defensive? If yes, then can he live with your boundary, without chafing, just because that's the right thing to do? This crossroads for a newish relationship is so telling. It is the crossroads. You're saying that you and your needs are right beside him and his needs, holding the same degree of importance. He either grasps this immediately, sees how his cohabitation-pressure campaign walks all over your equal standing, apologizes and backs off to let you think — or he doubles down on his impatience and keeps treating you as an obstinate means to his ends.

Leon Marchand of France celebrates after establishing a world record in the men's 200-meter individual medley Wednesday at the World Aquatics Championships in Singapore.

Lochte's 200 IM world mark falls to Frenchman

BY ALEX BUTLER

Leon Marchand sliced the pool water in 1 minute, 52.61 seconds to break

Ryan Lochte's 200-meter individual medley world record at the World Aquatics Championships on Wednesday in Singapore. The four-time Olympic gold medalist broke the 14-year-old record in the semifinals of the event at the Singapore Sports Hub. "I'm grateful for my coaches and all the staff behind me," Marchand, who earned a $30,000 check for his efforts, said on a streaming broadcast of the event. "It's been a pretty hard season, but I'm so happy to be here." American Shaine Casas finished second, 2.44 seconds behind the Frenchman. Great Britain's Duncan Scott placed third. Lochte set the record with a 1:54.00 on July 28, 2011, at the world championships. He also owned the previous mark from a 1:54.10 swim in 2009. Michael Phelps set the record in the event eight times before it was broken by Lochte. He clocked a 1:54.23 for his fastest time at the 2008 Summer Olympics. Marchand will compete in the finale at the 2025 World Aquatics Championships -- with a chance to break his own record -- Thursday in Singapore.

Canadian Summer McIntosh (400 freestyle and 200M medley), Australian Mollie O'Callaghan (200M freestyle), German Lukas Maertens (400M freestyle) and Americans Katie Ledecky (1500M freestyle) and Gretchen Walsh (100M butterfly) are among the notable gold medal winners so far at the world championships. The 2025 World Aquatics Championships will run through Sunday.

Olympic medalist Kerley pulls out of USATF Champs

BY FIELD LEVEL MEDIA

Sprinter Fred Kerley will not take part in the USA Track and Field Championships, set to begin Thursday in Eugene, Ore. His withdrawal from the event makes the two-time Olympic medalist unable to participate in the World Championships in Tokyo. A specialist in the 100-meter distance, Kerley, 30, announced his withdrawal on social media

Wednesday. "The 100m should be a straight sprint. 2025 has presented many hurdles. Taking some time out to get back on track. No USATF Champs this year. Thanks to all my supporters," he posted. Kerley won gold medals in the 100 at the 2022 World Championships in Eugene and in the 400 relay in Budapest in 2023. At the Olympics, he took home a silver medal from the 2020 Tokyo

Games and a bronze from the 2024 Paris Games. His personal best in the event is 9.76 seconds, set in 2022 in Eugene. Kerley was arrested in Florida in May and charged with touch or strike battery after his former girlfriend alleged he struck her in the face with a closed fist. At the time, his attorney told The Athletic that Kerley was arrested without a "thorough investigation." "Fred never battered anyone," Richard L. Cooper said in a statement to The Athletic. "We are focused on working with prosecutors to show that this arrest was a mistake and no charges should be filed. I am confident in that goal."
